Symbol Pokemusu

The symbol musu, unown are named for their unusual method of communication. Where they use thin tendrils on their backs to form shapes reminiscent of text characters in a sequence. Unown tend to cover themselves up and coupled with their rarity, most don't have a good grasp on what unown look like. Though they are humanoid, bipedal and always have one eye.

It's believed that unown currently exist in their own space created by Arceus. In the time of testament, Arceus tasked unown with various jobs to create the world but after they were finished she placed them into a sort of "alternate space". Which has properties unlike our own world.

In the few times where unown have been found outside this space, they've only been seen for short periods of time before they disappear into thin air. Presumably back to their home world. Despite having mouths, they've never been heard speaking. Some claim to have mind melded with the musu at their touch to communicate with them but none of our researchers have experienced this to confirm with certainty.

Unown have never been witnessed in conflict. As of now we don't know how they would participate in that.

☒Trainer Tips

While they're exceptionally rare, unown have a tendency to appear in places of knowledge. Such examples include universities or the ruins of ancient libraries. Some researchers claim to have contacted unown by offering stores of knowledge to them.

"You can call me E, unlike G I don't send chills. I'd rather flex my tendrils." - The first recorded statement from an unown. They called themselves "E" as it was the closest thing in our language to their name.

Patient Pokemusu

The patient musu, Wobbuffet, is referred to as such because they can and do wait longer than any other musu found. They refuse to do much of anything when observed, even if the observer isn't within sight range of the musu. We believe they're able to do this because of latent psychic abilities.

They primarily live in caves and aren't social with others. If approached they'll slowly move deeper into the caves, careful to keep their backs hidden from view. If one attempts to trick them to see behind them they will become enraged and attack.

Most humans consider Wobbuffet "creepy" as they don't open their eyes and speak very rarely. Many myths about Ditto are also applied to Wobbuffet, albeit unfairly as Wobbuffet's shape changing is incredibly short term.

Wobbuffet seldom initiate attacks on their own, most often they simply wait and when attacked physically will change their bodies to match the opponents and return the attack in nearly identical ways as the opponent. When attacked magically they coat their bodies in a mirror like sheen that reflects most spells off them. Because of this fighting Wobbuffet is quite obnoxious and few bother with it.

 Trainer Tips

There have been cases of Wobbuffet getting into arguments with each other, when these become heated, both musu will go mute and stare each other down. This goes on until one of them tires and gives up. Making the other the winner.

"You wish to see my back? Apologies but we have a great unfounded fear of letting others see our backs. I assure you it's not a cheap trick. But simply a quirk of ours." - Statement from Ainu, a Wobbuffet

Long Neck Pokemusu

The long neck musu, Girafarig, surprisingly, doesn't have a particularly long neck. Though it does two heads. Some researchers initially wanted to classify it by this definition but their second heads don't appear sapient and thus led to massive debates if they were actually heads or just strange looking tails. Eventually researchers got fed up and just decided on "long neck musu".

The musu's head tails do process sensory information, as Girafarig can detect those approaching behind them, even when sleeping. Said heads are also the source of Girafarig's psychic talents.

Girafarig tribes live on the plains and form their society around worship of their head tails. They give tribute, feast and celebrate according to the seemingly random undulations and pulses that come from their tail. While research hasn't implied the secondary heads have any awareness, Girafarig absolutely believe they are aware and capable of communication.

As their societies are fairly remote and insular, they don't have many external threats to face. Despite this, they are fairly skilled at fighting and will team up with their Girafarig sisters to dispatch any who threaten their villages.

Trainer Tips

Bonding with a Girafarig is possible though somewhat difficult to predict. As the musu will take cues from their head tail about potential partners and figuring out what appeases the secondary head isn't easy and often feels arbitrary.

"What do you think Kiran? Should we tell them what we know?." - Kiriko, a Girafarig we asked for comment.

"....." -The second head of Kiriko

In some of the more somber forests of the region, one may see musu hanging from the trees. These are Pineco. A unique musu that builds armor and weapons using pieces of bark fastened with their own saliva. A substance which has incredibly sticky and flammable properties.

Since their habitat possesses everything they need, Pineco rarely travel. Instead they live in isolated cloisters with their sisters. There they expand their armory, meditate and practice techniques with their hand crafted weapons.

Pineco don't take kindly to visitors and will attack any strangers who approach without good reason. Because of this, humans are wary to approach the forests they call home. The researchers with the most success approaching them came bearing honey. The Pineco still weren't cordial but they were open to discussion.

Attacking a Pineco is a poor idea, as attempting to approach them may result in being cut down and they're too camouflaged in the trees for most to attack from afar. It's also stated in rare occasions when a Pineco is in danger, they may ignite themselves and explode their armor to ensure that even in defeat, they take their foes with them.

 Trainer Tips

If Pineco believe that they're facing a strong foe, they'll eject pieces of their armor onto the forest floor to form caltrop layers. Some even coat their caltrops with poison to make them even more debilitating.

"I have fought the strongest Machop across the world, weathered spells from the most powerful magi and even sparred with living legends but fighting a Pineco on their turf? Never again... And don't even ask about Forretress..." - Sakura, a Primeape

While many consider Pineco to be one of the most dangerous musu, they can also enhance themselves into forretress and become even more hazardous than many thought possible. With the completed mastery of their hardening spit, forretress make their armor so strong that it's comparable to reinforced steel. Also they realize that they can combine this new tensile strength with its flammability to make long range artillery cannons.

With their enhanced perception and lack of care for other organisms, forretress will fire volleys at anything with a larger mana presence than a sunkern. This category includes most things that exist.

Because of forretress' explosive nature, humans would rather build around forretress than actually confront them. Even adventurers that would confront great evils will decline to approach forretress for fear of collateral damage.

Forretress' canons are terrifying to approach, especially since forretress can control them autonomously. But getting close doesn't make things any safer. Like Pineco, the musu is a master of sword fighting and even possess techniques their predecessors don't have like the gyro cut.

☒Trainer Tips

We have precious little information on forretress' appearance aside from their armor. While we have reason to believe the musu has a body beneath the shell, the only forretress we've been able to approach were still on guard and gave little information on such things.

"I'm #$$*@ing invincible!" - Yuyake, a forretress when asked if she'd not aim her canons at our researchers.

Land Snake Pokemusu

The seldom rumored and even less seen musu, Dunsparce, are referred to as the “land snake” musu. This is due to their propensity to bury themselves in dirt after drinking. Because the musu drinks almost constantly, they spend a great deal of time buried.

Dunsparce are seldom seen without their sake gourds. Though they usually leave them above ground when buried. This inspired a local myth that one should always refill an empty gourd should they find one in the middle of nowhere. We believe said myth was spread by Dunsparce as a way to get free drinks.

The musu’s propensity to drink makes their personalities vary somewhat. While most are quite relaxed, some are quick to agitation when tipsy. The one constant is lower inhibitions than most musu and humans alike.

☒Trainer Tips

Bonding with Dunsparce is fairly straightforward if you can find one. They enjoy drink, relaxing, music and spending time with others who like those things too. Just be sure not to disturb them if they’re sleeping as that can agitate them greatly.

“Partying away in sakeville~ searching for my lost pickles~ man comes to me and asks what I think~ so I ask for another drink~” - A Dunsparce drinking tune, often sung out of tune/time.

Travelers are advised to be cautious around mountain trails as Gligar make their lairs there. This musu is an ambush predator with a garish pink coloration. With such an unnatural hue, they're fairly easy to spot at a distance. However if one spots them too late, they'll likely have trouble outrunning the musu.

The musu attacks humans on sight, primarily by flying onto the victim and stinging them with their tail. Stung victims are put into a weakened state, allowing Gligar to drag them away to their villages. Here they will be put to work in their mines. Said villages are typically only populated by slaves and other Gligar as Gligar tend not to get along with other musu and human society alike.

Human society in general stays clear of Gligar as their temperament and proclivity toward slavery make them difficult to work with. Though there are underground connections to Gligar villages, which trade for their unethically sourced ore. Authorities are currently investigating these unscrupulous connections to put a stop to them.

Gligar's agility and natural resistance to electric magicks make them tricky to challenge. Though they are vulnerable to ice spells.

Trainer Tips

Its unknown if Gligar can understand compassion and kindness as each one we've encountered only express extreme self interest and anger. Because of this we don't recommend bonding with them. "Some rumors have circulated about Gligar having an atypical reproductive cycle where they lay eggs inside living hosts, with violent results. However, none of that is true. Their reproduction is relatively "normal" among musu." - Gunpei Sakamoto, researcher of Gligar habitats.

The first discovered "steel" musu (in Johto) is Steelix. Which are actually Onix that undergo a particular ardent shift. It's believed this shift results from the musu training their physical toughness so much that their stone bodies refine into ore and then further into metal.

Steelix prefer to dwell where they train, that being mountainous areas and large cave systems. Here they push their steel scales to the limit in an effort to strengthen them even more. They do this by purposely rusting parts of their coat and then breaking them off so they can grow in stronger than before.

Unlike their Onix sisters, Steelix won't attack people on sight. Though they still might be aggressive if you're exceptionally obnoxious and or get in the way of them pursuing their as they say "sick gains".

While Steelix's defense is impeccable when it comes to physical strength, they have trouble when attacked with fire, water and even some earth magicks. No matter how dense metal is, it still always has a melting point and Steelix has few recourses against such attacks. Some Steelix have tried to purify their metal to the point that it could withstand these attacks but attempts thus far haven't been successful.

☒Trainer Tips

Kantonian and Johto scholars have debated incessantly on who discovered steel musu first. Kantonians technically categorized Magnemite first but forgot to analyze the musu's mana makeup and thus labeled it as purely electric, it was only when Steelix was presented that they thought to recheck their data.

"My routine has four goals, count em. Harder, harder, harder and harder!"

- Mafuyu, a Steelix we approached for comment.

Surprisingly, Snubbull is a fairy musu and classified as such. Many assume otherwise because of the musu's chronic underbite but upon meeting Snubbull and learning of their kind demeanor. Most quickly understand that the musu is most definitely a fairy.

While many consider Snubbull to be "ugly" there is a core group of humans (mostly women) who find Snubbull greatly appealing and will invite them to live in their homes as servants and bodyguards. Though the musu seldom like being referred to as bodyguards and will instead call themselves "strong friends" or similar titles.

Some humans consider Snubbull scary, which greatly saddens and offends the musu. If they find out someone thinks of them this way they'll have a fit and seek out ways to adjust their appearance to be more appealing.

Snubbull are relatively small and their strength reflects this. However, their appearance works to their advantage in combat situations. As many would be aggressors are intimidated by Snubbull at a glance and can be startled away with a threat or roar. If these strategies fail though, they have few options to fall back on and will usually run away.

 Trainer Tips

Snubbull are take great joy in cuddling and are incredibly affectionate to those that care for them. This fact makes bonding with the musu fairly straight forward.

"You think I'm pretty, don't you? Don't you!? Then tell me how, come on! Tell me I'm pretty!"

- Hijouhi, a Snubbull when asked for comment.

Fairy Pokemusu

When a Snubbull is removed from the struggles of daily living for a significant amount of time. Their bodies and especially their teeth grow exponentially. So much so that the musu has trouble moving around with their heavy mouths. This new state of the musu we call Granbull.

Granbull have only come about by spending their time with families that support them to the point where they're completely spoiled. Even Snubbull that have minor responsibilities will not become Granbull.

With their new larger stature, Granbull are considered by most to be even more intimidating than their Snubbull sisters. However unlike their sisters, Granbull are almost completely helpless in noble houses, Granbull become so pampered that they lose the ability to do most of the tasks required of said jobs.

This extends to combat potential as well as while Granbull appear stronger than Snubbull at a glance. They are nothing of the sort and actively panic when they encounter any kind of threat. Some theorize that Granbull could become strong fighters but given the social circumstances surrounding them, we have yet to find any evidence of them being capable of such a thing.

 Trainer Tips

In our search for the elusive Granbull we found one who had a job, Makiko Koishi, the head for the Koishi zaibatsu. Which produces sake and other drinks. The job has so few responsibilities that even a Granbull can handle it.

"You see the responsibilities for being a leader are inspiration and leadership and you can do those anywhere. You can do them in a boardroom, a beach, a boat, in bed. It's real convenient that way."

- Makiko Koishi, head of the Koishi zaibatsu.
